I could not heartily sympathise; and the sermon was happily such as hardly jarred with my own feelings on the subject even once. One of the most pleasing recollections I have throughout was hearing the voice of the Archdeacon breaking in from time to time in the service--the same voice which had in the conversation of Friday sanctioned my protest against the clauses. I feel as if I was gradually awaking into a new life; the old one really seems, and I hope I shall feel it to be, lying far behind, and separated from me by an impassable barrier. If anything could have added to the solemnity of the thing, or taken the sting out of the troubles of making the irrevocable step, it would have been the beautiful letter which I enclose to you from Arnold. 5 The last sentence alludes to a conversation we had the last time I was at Rugby. I write from Guys Hospital: shall be down by the Telegraph (coach) tomorrow. Appendix To Chapter VII (0 Hints on the Formation of a Plan for the Safe and Effectual Revival of the Professorial System at Oxford. By a Resident Member of Convocation. Parker, Oxford. 1839. A short notice of some points in a pamphlet which attracted no small attention at the time may be of interest, as illustrative of the views of University reformers at a distance of half a century from the present time. The main proposals were...
