Excerpt from Australia; Production and Marketing of Grain for Export: A Competition Report Marketing arrangements for Australian coarse grains for both domestic and export markets are complicated and often poorly understood overseas. As a result, this report treats these arrangements with particular detail, emphasizing distinctions between statutory boards and farmer cooperatives, highlighting special arrangements with bulk-handling authorities whose chief responsibility is generally toward wheat movement, and examining export marketing arrangements. Although still small by comparison with the wheat industry, the Australian rice industry is an especially intriguing sector of the Australian grain economy, with exports increasing at an average annual rate of about 25 percent. Yields are among the highest in the world, mills are sophisticated and modern, and marketing arrangements are as highly centralized as those of the Australian Wheat Board. Production potential in the largely undeveloped northern half of the country is, like that for sorghum, considerable.
